photolysis of the nitro radical cation: a local kinetic method. A two-dimensional crossed electron-electron-electron (XEE) recombination trap model has been used to model the temperature effect on the photolysis of the nitro radical cation NONO_2^{*+} . Nonsynchronous single ionization and chemical dissociation rate constants as well as the corresponding Arrhenius parameters have been determined for the XEE recombination cross section. The differences between the rate constants and the Arrhenius parameters obtained from the present study and other reported values are discussed. The nonlinearity of the Arrhenius plots is explained by the temperature dependence of ionization probabilities and the temperature dependence of chemical dissociation probabilities. It is also shown that the temperature dependence of the photolysis rate constant is strongly dependent on the arrangement of temperature. The temperature dependence of the photolysis rate constant is discussed on the basis of two-step photochemical ionization and temperature dependence of the chemical dissociation rate constant and a chemical quenching probability of the triplet state radical. Summaries Climate change policies as reflected in the Kyoto Protocol are very far from achieving the goals they were based on, including the reduction of greenhouse gas emissions in order to meet the global warming target of at least 2 °C above preindustrial levels. Such policies rather support the adaptation of developing countries to the adverse effects of climate change, and even their vulnerability and vulnerability insurance. There are different ways to solve the problem: reducing the volume of greenhouse gas emissions by using clean technologies, replacing fossil fuel resources by biomass, developing biofuel, etc. This publication of TEPAV is dedicated to climate change policy and addresses some issues of the Kyoto Protocol such as the purpose of the Protocol, its legal status, its implementation and its effects on developing countries.
